A friend and I arranged to spend a whole Sunday taking a long walk in the country. We set off on an early train, each carrying a heavy bag filled with sandwiches, cakes, fruit and bottles of lemonade. I wondered how two people would be would be able to finish it all.

Soon we had left behind the smoky air of the city and had reached the country station where our walk was to begin. We were lucky, because the sun was shining and there was a gentle breeze to make it just right for walking.

We decided to go on a walk called the Four Mile Square: it has four equal sides, each about four miles in length and on a map looks like a rough square. It is famous because each side passes through a different kind of country.

We started off in a high spirits along the first side, which followed a river, planning to have a swim and our first meal before we left it. Before long, we came to a gate near which there was a notice "Beware of the bull". We were very annoyed. Our path ran through this field, and, as it was a public foot-path, the farmer had no right to put a dangerous animal in it. "Oh, but it's all right," my friend said. "this bull is tied up. Come on."

I followed, because I could see for myself a strong rope tied to the ring in its nose at one end and round a large tree at the other. We felt very bold and walked nearer, waving a red handkerchief just to show that we weren't afraid.

The bull began to walk towards us- and did not stop. "He seems to have a long rope." I said, walking more quickly. The bull too was walking more quickly. Then, at the same moment we both saw that the rope was broken, and without another word we began to run.

We were half way across the field but it didn't take us long to reach the gate again. We jumped over, very much out of breath, and looked back to see the bull quietly examining a bag of foot. " that was a clever trick of mine, wasn't it?" said my friend: "I dropped the foot on purpose to draw away the bull's attention." "No," I cried, "it was not clever! I dropped mine accidentally."
